Cause No. 2:21-cv-0811 TSZ

DEFENDANTS' MOTION FOR PROTECTIVE ORDER

Note on Motion Calendar:
July 8, 2022

Defendants, by and through their undersigned counsel, hereby move under Rule 26(c) Fed.R.Civ.P for a protective order directing that the information sought from third party PayPal Inc., pursuant to the subpoena (copy attached as Exhibit A) issued by Plaintiff Bungie, Inc., on June 23, 2022 be provided, if at all, only on such terms and conditions as this court may direct.

In support of this motion, Defendants state as follows:

1. PayPal Inc., is engaged in the business of providing online payment services to its subscribers. Subscribers are able to receive online payments from others such as, for example, when an item is sold online. Similarly, subscribers are able to make payments to others via online transactions facilitated by PayPal. PayPal thus serves much in the manner of a bank wherein subscribers conduct much or all of their financial activities through their services, which transaction can and often do go far beyond simply making purchases on, for

1 example, eBay. Information collected and retained by PayPal is just as private and sensitive 2 as private banking information retained by more traditional forms of banks.

3 2. At one time, Defendant Phoenix Digital Group LLC, along with the remaining 4 Defendants had an maintained accounts with PayPal. For reasons that remain unknown and 5 unexplained, PayPal, in April 2020, abruptly and unilaterally canceled Defendants' accounts 6 and barred them from accessing their own records. Upon information and belief, such unilateral action by PayPal was instigated at the behest of Bungie.

7 3. The subpoena issued by Bungie to PayPal broadly seeks all financial records 8 possessed by PayPal relating not only to the corporate and individual defendants here, but also 9 to the wives and children of the individual defendants. These documents and records are not 10 limited to information relevant to the issues here, namely the extent of Defendants' 11 distribution of the subject products and the revenues derived therefrom, but include 12 information regarding all of Defendants' products and sales far beyond those involved here, 13 which only make up a small fraction of Defendants overall sales and revenues. There is no 14 legitimate reason for Bungie to receive sensitive business information that does not, and that 15 cannot, have any bearing on the products at issue here, namely those products Bungie identifies as "Destiny 2" "cheat software."

16 4. Furthermore, because many of the individuals named in the subpoena used 17 PayPal for personal financial transactions, the records, if provided, could disclose sensitive 18 personal information (such as payments to medical, legal or other providers) that have 19 absolutely nothing to do with any of the issues here and which is, for lack of a better term, 20 none of Bungie's business. This is particularly true in the case of family members who were 21 not involved in any of Defendants' activities but are, nonetheless identified in the subpoena and whose personal information would be released.

22 5. Similarly, it appears the goal of the subpoena is to identify Defendants'
23 customers as well. The identities of these customers has nothing to do with any legitimate 24 issue in this case. Indeed, Defendants have already provided their sales volumes and revenues 25 for the subject products to Bungie and have no objection to discovery into those subjects.
26 Seeking the names and identities of Defendants' customers is not only highly irrelevant, it 27 appears intended to enable Bungie to harass Defendants' customers by dragging them into this 28 matter with ostensible "third party" discovery. Given Bungie's admitted goal of, "[putting]

1 cheaters and those who assist them on notice that Bungie does not and will not tolerate 2 cheating in Destiny 2,” (Dkt# 1, Complaint ¶4), obtaining the identity of Defendants’ 3 customers by way of the subpoena to PayPal is clearly intended to enable Bungie to do
4 precisely this. As it has by no means been anywhere established that “cheating in Destiny 2” 5 is either unlawful or otherwise a legitimate concern of this Court, allowing discovery via this 6 subpoena to proceed not only serves no legitimate interest of Bungie but clearly compromises 7 the rights and interests of third parties who simply have no bearing on the legitimate issues of 8 this case.

9 6. To the extent PayPal has relevant information, that information consists of how 10 many of the subject “Destiny 2” “cheat software” products were distributed by Defendants 11 and what revenues were derived therefrom. Who these products were sold to has no bearing 12 on either liability or the measure of damages, should liability ever be found. What other 13 products were distributed by Defendants are not and cannot be the concern of Bungie in this 14 case, nor can the private financial records of both the Defendants and third parties be of any 15 legitimate concern either.

16 7. Finally, Defendants’ Motion for Partial Dismissal of the Amended Complaint
17 (Dkt#40) remains pending and has not even been fully briefed, much less decided. If granted, 18 the individual Defendants in this case will be dismissed entirely. Given that the subpoena
19 clearly affects the individual Defendants, and given that there is an can be no legitimate claim 20 that time is of the essence, Bungie will not be harmed, and Defendants will avoid considerable 21 harm, if the subpoena is held in abeyance pending a decision on the motion.

22 8. For all these reasons, compliance with the subpoena, if at all, should be limited 23 to PayPal records sufficient to show the number, if any, of the subject “Destiny 2” “cheat 24 software” products that were distributed by Defendants and what revenues if any, were 25 derived therefrom. Specifically, all inquires into third parties, including but not limited to 26 customers for Defendants’ products, should be completely barred as having no legitimate 27 bearing on the issues in this case and, more importantly, to protect them from harm. Finally, 28 all inquiries into products other than the “Destiny 2” “cheat software” products should be barred as having no relationship to the issues in this case and to avoid the disclosure of sensitive business information that is not the legitimate concern of Bungie in this action.

Such action by this Court is respectfully requested.
